

The Telecommunications Act of 1996 led to much greater concentration of ownership of radio stations, less variety of expression, and in many cases just lousy, homogenized programming.

I oppose any proposals to change current FCC rules that will lead to greater concentration of ownership in any media forms or between different media forms. Yes, the Internet is changing media, but for now the broadcast media and newspapers are still dominant, and we need to maintain at least the diversity of ownership that we have today.
